Reduction of thrombocytopenia during C1-inhibitor for the treatment of hereditary angioedema. The safety of administration of C1-inhibitor (C1-INH) in hereditary angioedema (HAE) due to C1-inhibitor deficiency (C1-INH-HAE) has been studied extensively over the last decade. The experience with six patients treated for severe acute attacks with C1-INH is documented herein. C1-INH was given i.v. over 30 min every 3-4 h until angioedema attacks resolved. Four females and two males were treated. The median number of infusions per patient was 10 (range 3-20). Platelet counts were monitored during treatment. Infusion was stopped in six patients if the platelet count decreased below $30 \times 10^9/l$. C1-INH was also used as first line therapy in three patients. The median number of infusions was 10 (range 5-20) for these 3 patients.

Platelet counts decreased below $30 \times 10^9/l$ in two of these three patients, but spontaneously returned to normal after receiving a few additional infusions. During a median follow-up of 4 months after treatment, no further thrombocytopenia was reported. Blood pressure, glucose, lipids and electrocardiogram were not affected by C1-INH. Two patients reported an increase in headache during treatment. Spontaneous remission of acute attacks was reported in all patients.

Thrombocytopenia occurs in a few patients during the acute phase of HAE, and may complicate the immediate management of patients. C1-INH does not appear to induce thrombocytopenia. Platelet count should be monitored when C1-INH is administered as first line treatment of acute attacks in C1-INH-HAE. We have already announced the AirPods 2, which will be available in the markets at some point in the month of
