Before pregnancy, hyperprolactinemia is not a cause for concern. On the contrary, after spontaneous ovulation and during the first trimester of gestation, the hypothalamic-pituitary lactotropes become functionally suppressed and prolactin levels fall to normal. During the second and third trimesters, however, the pituitary lactotropes become hyperstimulated by gonadotropin stimulation, hyperprolactinemia emerges, and amenorrhea develops. In the third trimester of pregnancy, hyperprolactinemia inhibits parturition and can cause problems in delivery. In the second trimester, these problems can lead to cognitive impairment in the newborn. While most of the cases of hyperprolactinemia seen in the general population are idiopathic, some are due to ectopic or functional pituitary adenomas, autoimmune endocrinopathies, and other diseases that affect the hypothalamus or pituitary. Treatments for hyperprolactinemia, such as bromocriptine, have been in existence for nearly 40 years.
